Here at the Fishblog, we're well aware that we're not the first to run through this stadium hype. Fans have been obsessing over the massive changes to the Purple and Gold for decades, but the finally those upgrades are coming to fruition. Head coach Chip Kelly wasn't able to escape the confines of the stadium during his introductory press conference, but those improvements have surely made their way into his conversations. Today, we're going to take a closer look at the renovations that have helped make the house on the bay more palatable. As a fixture of the Bay Area sports scene for decades, Levi's is no stranger to the Bay. The company's corporate headquarters and stadium can both be seen during the courses of an afternoon here, but it's the San Francisco 49ers that have kept the stand strong over the years. From flying squads to the great George Seifert, Levi's has continued to come along with the changes, building a new facility in Santa Clara and hosting countless legends of the game here as the franchise has made its way through the process. From the Levi's Stadium homepage, the men's and women's soccer home venues are both clearly visible, with the former below and the latter on the opposite side of the stadium. We've got a complete list of the renovations here, and we'll keep it fresh up-to-date as we see the improvements come to fruition. Let's move on to the detail that sets Levi's Stadium apart from all of the other "stadiums." The big change has to be the garages, which currently host the 49ers' practice facility. Those have been relocated to the south end of the venue, moving approximately 800 feet away from the field. The former turf has been completely removed in its entirety, replaced by new synthetic turf. In a press release, the 49ers "said the new grass will be more resilient and more absorbent to lower the risk of tornados and hurricanes during a season." The decision to only remove the artificial turf
